Reclaiming Cultural Moments, Locally and Globally: Winning in an Era of Attention Warfare

Movies aren't just competing with other movies anymore—they're battling every platform, creator, and micro-moment that steals audience focus, from TikTok trends to gaming binges. In a world where cultural relevance is earned daily, theatrical marketing timelines of 6–12 weeks simply can't keep pace with trends that appear and vanish in under 48 hours. This "relevance gap" leaves theaters reacting instead of leading. Yet exhibition holds advantages that no digital platform can touch: the collective electricity of shared in-person reactions, the sense of community that forms when strangers experience a story together, and the ritual of going to the movies that still carries cultural weight. This panel explores how theaters can reclaim cultural influence by shifting from

- Passive Screening to Active Cultural Staging—creating moments, environments, and experiences people feel compelled to talk about.
- Marketing at Fans to Co-Creating with Fandoms—inviting audiences to remix, participate, and help shape the cultural story around films.
